DIRECTOR MINNIGERODE LAUDS LATE F. B. McGUIRE

Principal Messer Makes Short Address Discussing Purposes and Work of the Institution.

ercoran Gallery of Art last evening to vitness the presentation of the gold the Corcoran School for the year just closing and to view the work of the udents, which is on exhibition.

As usual, the presentation and brief emonies in connection therewith ook place on the platform of the grand staircase, half way between floors, the audience thronging the stairs, the upper atrium and the main entrance hall. At 9 o'clock the notes of a bugle call ummoned attention, and at the same time the director of the gallery, C. P. Minnigerode, a member of the board of trustees; Gen. John M. Wilson, a member of the jury of award, and John Breyfogle and the faculty of the school took their seats.

Mr. Minnigerode called attention to the loss both gallery and school have suffered in the death of F. B. McGuire. suffered in the death of F. B. McGuire, for more than twenty years director, and paid tribute to his memory. He spoke, also, of the school, emphasizing the excellence of the quality of the work produced in past years as well as during the term just ended, noting especially the admirable showing made by students competing for the gold medal. Later he read the report of the jury of award, composed of Paul Bartlett, Hugh Breckenridge and John Breyfogle, and as each name was given the winner of the award stepped from among the audience, ascended the stairs and, amid a storm of applause, received the medal or certificate from Gen. Wilson.

Britis an old southern houselife or experiences, or even our emoment is an adequate expression of our life or experiences, or even our emoment is an adequate expression of our life or experiences, or even our emoment is an adequate expression of conditions, but I do undertake to say that it is already developing characteristics as a national art. America believes in her self—she believes in her future, in spite of a complication of conditions that can hardly come to any other people, but if we look largely at our efforts, at expression in art, literature, in philosophy, we shall find that we are interested, curious, experimental, with touches of audactity in our experiments, with an interest that does not wane, a curiosity that wins determinate results.
In current exhibitions of our art we realize that the American painter has ceased to grone that as a rule to the destribution of the school, made a short address. He said, in part, as follows:

"We may ask ourselves just what are the obligations of a school of the character of ours? What should be its legitimate aims, what part may it be expetted to assume in the general endeavor on the part of the American at the obligations of a school of the character of ours? What should be its legitimate aims, what part may it be expetted to assume in the general endeavor on the part of the American at the obligations of a school of the character of ours? What should be its legitimate aims, what part may it be water of ours? What should be its legitimate aims, what part may it be acter of ours? What should be its legitimate aims, what part may it be acter of ours? What should be its legitimat curiosity that wins determinate results. In current exhibitions of our art we realize that the American painter has ceased to grope, that as a rule he has learned his trade. He is, indeed, rather more concerned with his art as a trade than we may desire. The art for art's sake idea insures a good understanding of the mechanics of art. The painter's touch becomes assured, too assured, perhaps; he expresses what he had in mind with authority. We may not be altogether satisfied with what he does have in his mind; we are more concerned, if we reason wisely, with what he has in his mind than with what he has at his finger's end, so to speak.

Work of the American Beinger.

Work of the American Painter.

"We find that the American painter has mastered the processes of his art nd is able to express with more or less adequacy his concept. But we note at less imperative, less inevitable than it should be, and lacking also, in a measure, not only in emotional force, but in a certain beauty, charm, richness, harmony; the highest attributes of per-

"Are the academic excellencies not to "Are the academic excellencies not to count, then? Is the academic school a mistake? So far as it bases itself in the cold pedantic formula, undertakes to run all natures and temperaments through or into one mold; so far as it discourages the vital impulse of differentiated temperaments it is a mistake, as has been proven again and again in the attempt to make over the genius by the patterns of old art without the spirit that made the great old art an eternal inheritance, an endless joy. But in so far as it lays a practical foundation on which all personalities alike must build it is not only valuable, it is indispensable.

"The business of a school like ours is to impart a fundamental knowledge of the structure of the human figure—to make clear its structural proportions, its interrelated bulks, its movement of bulks, the rightness and rhythm of its contours. This much we must impart or we shall have worked in vain.

"But at the same time, and during these processes, we must make the student understand that they lead to something that is ultimated.

"But at the same time, and during these processes, we must make the student understand that they lead to something that is ultimate; that accurate drawing, correct color combinations and a just understanding of values are a means to an end. Our business, then, is with the means, but we shall not neglect to point forward to that ultimate which rests with the student.

"I have said that the American has learned his trade. I can say more than that. There are individuals still, exceptions whose impulse has lifted them beyond the self-consciousness of craft. In these a force of real emotion gives widence of vital undercurrents. On this occasional emergence of the exceptional spirit, together with a very general prevalence of excellence in craft. I base my optimistic faith in the ultimate triumph of American art."
